Two Hundred Years in Eretz Yisrael:
The Seminal Aliyah of the Talmidei HaGra (1808-1810)

The year 2008 marks the bicentennial of a significant aliyah movement, which took place from 1808 to 1810—the arrival of 511 disciples of the Vilna Gaon and their families in Eretz Yisrael. A new book by Dr. Arie Morgenstern focuses on this aliyah and presents it in an entirely new light.

Basing his book HaShivah L’Yerushalayim: Chiddush HaYishuv HaYehudi B’Eretz Yisrael b’Techilat HaMeah Ha-19 (The Return to Jerusalem [Jerusalem, 2007]) on original research, Dr. Morgenstern concludes that it was these olim who renewed the Jewish presence in Eretz Yisrael. He further maintains that their settling in Jerusalem in 1816 ensured that by 1860 there was a Jewish majority in the Holy City, which has been maintained continuously to the present day. The author argues that the Jewish resettlement of Jerusalem, led by the Vilna Gaon’s disciples, was an implementation of the idea of hastening the Redemption via natural means. The rebuilding of the Old City and the first neighborhoods outside the city walls formed the foundation upon which the State of Israel was established in the following century. According to Dr. Morgenstern, the aliyah of these pioneers, known as the talmidei haGra, should rightfully be called the “First Aliyah” in terms of modern Jewish history. An excerpt from his book follows.
The Gaon Rabbi Eliyahu of Vilna (1720-1797), often called by the acronym “the Gra,” is renowned as the most important Torah authority of Ashkenazic communities in the past thousand years. His extraordinary talents, phenomenal memory, great wisdom and mastery of all branches of Jewish and general knowledge formed a figure that was larger than life—almost superhuman. The mere mention of “the Gra” evokes an image of constant, assiduous Torah study surpassing ordinary limits, of utter devotion to service of God and of character perfection. Since 1802, when the Volozhin Yeshiva was founded by the Gra’s disciple, Rabbi Chaim of Volozhin (who was considered the “father of the Lithuanian yeshivot”), generations of talmidei chachamim have been raised to aspire to this ideal.

Not many, however, are aware that the areas in which the Gra was principally engaged was kabbalah and the process of Redemption. According to the Gra’s thinking, the Geulah is not a one-time event but rather a gradual process. In his view, we are currently experiencing the ikvata d’Meshicha, the pre-Messianic period, and, on the historical timeline, we are standing on the threshold of the “Mashiach ben Yosef” period. According to the Gra’s approach, Redemption begins by natural means—as in the days of Coresh and the Second Temple—via aliya to Eretz Yisrael, settling the Land, bringing it out of its desolate state and, most importantly, rebuilding Jerusalem. (The Gra’s work Aderet Eliyahu states, “for the main thrust of the mitzvot is dependent on the Land.”) It was the Gra who, through his charismatic authority, dismissed the traditional passive approach of waiting for heavenly miracles to initiate the Geulah, which was based on the prohibitions known as the “three vows.” These vows are to not “go up as a wall” (referring to mass immigration to Eretz Yisrael), to not attempt to hasten the Redemption and to not rebel against the ruling nations while in exile. In his commentary on Shir HaShirim, the Gra states that these three vows apply only to the building of the Beit Hamikdash: “They are sworn not to, of their own volition, go out to build the Temple, until [the Mashiach] comes.”

The Gra’s authority, according to his talmidim, stems from a Divine mission placed upon him to discover secrets of the Torah and to accelerate the Redemption. This idea is based on a verse in Devarim, “Even sheleimah vetzedek yihyeh lach... [A perfect and honest weight you shall have]” (25:15). The verse, found in the sixth parashah of Sefer Devarim, includes the words “even sheleimah,” which are understood to allude to Eliyahu ben Shlomo (the Gra). According to this kabbalistic interpretation, the books of the Torah represent human history: The story of Creation in Sefer Bereishit represents the first millennium of the world’s existence; the rest of Bereishit refers to the second millennium; Sefer Shemot tells of the third; Sefer Vayikra, the fourth; Sefer Bamidbar, the fifth and Sefer Devarim, the sixth. Each of the ten parshiyot in Devarim (with Netzavim and Vayelech counted as one) represents one century of the sixth millennium. On this timeline, the words “even sheleimah vetzedek,” towards the end of the sixth parashah of Devarim, fall just at the point in history when the Gra, made his appearance on earth to carry out his Divine mission. The following parashah, corresponding to the seventh century of the sixth millennium, is that of “Ki tavo el haAretz [When you shall come to the Land].”

According to this interpretation, this clearly means that from the year 5600 (1840) the process of kibbutz ha-galuyot, the ingathering of the exiles, begins, and the process of Redemption on the deterministic path of “beitah,” in its appointed time, starts to unfold. The Gra himself, in the view of his disciples, was “a spark of Mashiach ben Yosef.”

The French Revolution of 1789 and Napoleon’s expedition to Eretz Yisrael in 1799 were interpreted by the Gra’s followers as historical proofs of the dramatic changes taking place in the world. As a result of these changes, the belief that the Gra indeed had a Divine mission to advance the Redemption was strengthened, and his disciples began organizing groups for aliya. Arriving in three waves, 511 followers of the Gra and their family members settled first in the Galilee region and, later on, in Jerusalem. These olim were not fleeing from war, economic hardship or persecution, and they included some of Lithuania’s wealthiest and most respected and learned Jews. In fact, their aliya was part of a Messianic revival that took place among arrive suddenly and by miraculous means in 1840, the Gra’s disciples clung to the view that the Geulah was a historical process that should be advanced by human action. The talmidei haGra, also known as the Perushim, first directed their activities towards the rebuilding of Jerusalem. In 1816, after receiving a permit and an official order exonerating them from the monetary debt incurred by the Ashkenazi community of Jerusalem in the time of Rabbi Yehudah HaChassid [see sidebar on the Hurva for more detail], a group settled in the Holy City, led by Rabbi Mendel Mishklov, the greatest of the Gra’s disciples in kabbalah and the person responsible for printing most of the Gra’s works on halachah and kabbalah before leaving Europe. After anchoring themselves in their new community by setting up a beit midrash, the talmidei haGra set their sights on a goal: to rebuild the Chatzer HaShulchan, the ruined courtyard of Rabbi Yehudah HaChassid, and, as an act of “tikkun,” to restore the ruined Hurva Synagogue and to build a residential neighborhood adjacent to it. For twenty years, the Perushim tried to overcome the opposition of the Muslim waqf and the Ottoman authorities to the restoration of the synagogue, since the building of synagogues was prohibited under Muslim law in every place under Muslim rule. Although the Perushim managed, through heavy bribes, to extract promises that the permits necessary for rebuilding the shul would be granted, those promises were not fulfilled. The Muslim authorities did not wish to see a revival of the Ashkenazic community in Jerusalem, and they did all they could to banish of the Perushim discontinued certain customs associated with mourning the destruction of the Temple, such as the midnight recitation of Tikkun Chatzot and the stanza beginning “Hitna’ari, meafar kumi” from the liturgical poem.

Not too many are aware that the areas in which the Gra was principally engaged was kabbalah and the process of Redemption.

the Jewish people in the early nineteenth century. But unlike the thousands of other Jews who had left the lands of the Ottoman Empire for Eretz Yisrael at that time to await the coming of Mashiach, whom they expected to roof, weeping, throwing myself about, and pleading before our Father in Heaven. And my daughter, the modest Marat Sheindel, tichyeh, was also of tender age and lay ill beside me. And my tears were upon my cheeks, my eyes poured out water over all that had come upon me, and my sorrow was great.

At that time, Rabbi Yisrael Mishklov made a vow that if he and his daughter survived he would write a sefer on the halachot hataluyot ba’Aretz [laws that apply to the Land of Israel] according to the approach of the Gra. In contrast to Rabbi Menachem Mendel Mishklov, who thought that the plague had come upon the olim as a punishment because they had not settled in Jerusalem, Rabbi Yisrael Mishklov decided to remain in Tzfat. He wanted to build it up as a spiritual center in a further effort to advance the Geulah by the earthly means of reviving true semichah and the Sanhedrin. As is known, the chain of semichah that began with Moshe Rabbeinu was broken after the destruction of the Second Temple. The first attempt to restore the Sanhedrin was made by Rabbi Yaakov Beirav in 1538, who relied on the Rambam's opinion that if all [i.e., a majority of] the sages of Eretz Yisrael agree to revive the practice of semichah, it could be done. Strong opposition to the attempt was led by Rabbi Levi ben Chaviv (Ralbach), and a protracted dispute ensued, leaving the matter unsettled.

Rabbi Yisrael Mishklov tried to avoid the same problem that had brought about the previous failure. He decided to search for chachanim semuchim, sages upon whom semichah had already been conferred, and so in 5591 (1830), he sent an envoy to the deserts of Yemen to look for the Ten Lost Tribes. He believed that the Ten Tribes were somewhere in the world, and that the institution of the Sanhedrin had been preserved among them since their expulsion from Eretz Yisrael at the time of the destruction of the First Temple. Therefore, he thought, there must be semuchim among them who could trace their semichah back to that given by Moshe Rabbeinu; through these semuchim, the semichah of sages for a restored Sanhedrin in Eretz Yisrael could be effected. Thus, significant advances would be made in encouraging the Redemption through these acts of “et’aruta deletata,” or, as he gracefully expressed it in his letter to the Ten Tribes, “for all these things require an initial awakening from below.”

Another focus of activity for the Gra’s disciples was that of the mitzvot hataluyot ba’Aretz, as a means of hastening the Redemption. Almost immediately upon their arrival in 1810, the talmidei haGra purchased parcels of cultivated agricultural land with the intention of performing the mitzvot hataluyot ba’Aretz, as had been suggested by Rabbi Chaim of Volozhin. Later, during the rule of Muhammad Ali (1831-1840), they appealed several times to the authorities in Jerusalem for an arrangement whereby they could lease land for agricultural purposes, and for permission to set up workshops and engage in agricultural and urban commerce. All such requests were turned down by the Muslim authorities in Jerusalem.

According to the Gra, Redemption begins by natural means, via aliya to Eretz Yisrael, settling the Land, bringing it out of its desolate state and, most importantly, rebuilding Jerusalem.

Galilee, with a view towards making a large portion of Eretz Yisrael’s Jews into farmers, he did so in cooperation with the talmidei haGra.

In 1837 an earthquake struck the Galilee, wreaking nearly total destruction on Tzfat and Tiberius and killing 2,016 Jews. The Perushim of Jerusalem then claimed that it had been wrong to settle in Tzfat rather than Jerusalem, and, indeed, after the disaster, most new olim had no choice but to settle in Jerusalem. Jerusalem was thus built up as a result of the leveling of Tzfat. Due to a shortage of housing, many Jews bought property in the Muslim Quarter, and the Jewish presence in Jerusalem expanded significantly. In 1855, Moshe Montefiore succeeded in obtaining a permit from the Sultan to build the large Hurva Synagogue (otherwise known as “Beit Yaakov” Synagogue) in the courtyard of Rabbi Yehudah HaChassid. Upon its completion in 1864, the courtyard once again became the center of community life for the Ashkenazim of Jerusalem, and served as a symbol of the rebuilding of Jerusalem. The courtyard included the Beit Din Tzedek of the community, batei midrash, Yeshivat Eitz Chaim and Volozhin; Rabbi Meir Auerbach of Kalish; Rabbi Yehoshua Leib Diskin and his son, Rabbi Yitzchak Yerucham Diskin; Rabbi Yosef Chaim Sonnenfeld and many others.

In retrospect, it is clear that the connections forged by the talmidei haGra with political circles in Britain upon their arrival in the Holy Land were a crucial factor in determining the fate of the future Jewish Yishuv.

The Hurva Synagogue

In 1701, a group of Polish Jews, led by Rabbi Yehudah HaChassid, began building a synagogue for their community in Jerusalem. Two decades later, because of a lack of funds, the building was still unfinished. The congregation’s failure to pay for the construction resulted in riots and in its expulsion from Jerusalem in 1720. Arab creditors tore down the incomplete structure. The remnants remained for some time, giving the synagogue its name, “Hurva,” which means “ruins” in Hebrew. The talmidei haGra rebuilt the synagogue, designed in a grand Neo-Byzantine style, in 1864, and for the next eighty-four years it was one of the largest buildings in the Old City. In 1948, during Israel’s War of Independence, the Jordanian army destroyed the Hurva as part of an effort to eradicate the Jewish presence in the Old City. Since the Israeli capture of Jerusalem in 1967, the Hurva has been under Israeli control. For decades, little remained of the synagogue except for a slender arch, erected in 1977. In 2006, the Israeli government began work on a multi-million dollar project to construct an exact replica of the Hurva. - Ed.

The influence of British policy-makers was central to the pivotal decisions made in 1840 at the conference of the Christian powers of Europe, which took place in London, concerning the struggle between the Turkish Sultan and Muhammad Ali. The British proposal to restore power in Eretz Yisrael to the Sultan, under British protection and supervision, kept the option of returning to Zion open for the Jewish people. At the same time, Britain foiled the plans of the other great powers (Russia, Prussia, and Austria) to turn Eretz Yisrael into a Christian state or an independent Arab state under Muhammad Ali. Had these tempting proposals been implemented, they might have put an end to the return of the Jews to their ancestral land.

The principle held by the talmidei haGra—that the rebuilding of Jerusalem should be undertaken as a way of hastening the Redemption—led to, among other things, the tremendous effort invested in building the first housing projects outside the Old City walls. The results of this effort were astonishing; within a period of only fifty years, the Jews of Jerusalem were transformed from a persecuted minority to a clear majority of the city’s residents, outnumbering even the combined Muslim and Christian populations. The Jews have continually maintained this demographic predominance (in Jerusalem) since the 1860s.

The activist ideology of the Gra’s disciples, with its central dogma of encouraging aliya and undertaking the rebuilding of Jerusalem—evident in the re-establishment of the courtyard of Rabbi Yehudah HaChassid and the Hurva Synagogue; the building of Jewish neighborhoods outside the city walls; the creation of the agricultural settlement of Petach Tikvah; the initiation of fundraising among the Diaspora Jews to support the Yishuv and the elicitation of political support among Western powers for the concept of the “Return to Zion”—played a major role in the turn of events that took place in the nineteenth century resulting in the renewal of a Jewish presence in Eretz Yisrael.

The aliya in 1808 by the Gra’s disciples was a turning point in the history of Eretz Yisrael. In the wake of their arrival, the concept of “Eretz Yisrael” underwent a metamorphosis, changing from an abstract idea—a subject of prayers and dreams—to an actuality, a concrete community of Jews living in the Holy Land. The olim’s accomplishments provided the subsequent Zionist movement a foundation upon which to build. It is fair to say that everything Zionists have built in Eretz Yisrael, up to the establishment of the State of Israel and beyond, was made possible by this seminal aliya.

its accompanying talmudei Torah, a bikkur cholim society and other charitable institutions.

A list of all of the giants in Torah scholarship who have lived in Jerusalem since the aliya of the Gra’s disciples would be very long. Among them were Rabbi Hillel Rivlin and his son, Rabbi Moshe Maggid; Rabbi Yosef Zundel of Salant and his son-in-law, Rabbi Shmuel Salant; Rabbi Yaakov Berlin, father of the Netziv of Jerusalem.
